

Παμπρέπιος ὁ Πανοπολίτης

Pamprepius of Panopolis on the Lion Hunt

eul_aid: unw

Period: Ὀψιμαρχαία Late Antique

Dialect: Ἑπική Epic \(Homeric\)

Domain: Ἔπος Epic

Format: Ἑμμετρος Verse

Pamprepius of Panopolis was a fifth-century pagan poet and grammarian from Egypt. After studying and teaching in Athens, he secured the patronage of the general Illus in Constantinople, where he was appointed to a public professorship. His career became entwined with Illus's rebellion against Emperor Zeno; Pamprepius served as an advisor and used divination to predict the revolt's success.

The revolt failed, and Pamprepius was killed by Illus's brother-in-law, Trocundes, during the siege of Papius in Isauria in 484. No poetic works by Pamprepius survive. The tenth-century Byzantine encyclopedia, the Suda, records that he wrote a patria of Constantinople and other verses, but these are lost.

Pamprepius exemplifies the continued political influence of pagan intellectuals in the Christian Eastern Roman Empire. His life is historically significant for its close association with high politics and revolt, illustrating how a scholar's fate could be determined by the volatile loyalties of the late antique world.

Works (1)

- Ἀποσπάσματα περὶ Κυνηγίας Λέοντος · Fragments on a Lion Hunt · 162 passages