Eusebius of Caesarea was a Christian bishop, scholar, and historian who lived during the late Roman Empire, from approximately 260 to 340 CE. He served as the bishop of Caesarea in Palestine and lived through the pivotal transition from the persecution of Christians under Emperor Diocletian to the religion's official acceptance under Emperor Constantine I.

Eusebius was a student of the scholar Pamphilus and was deeply influenced by the theological traditions of Origen. He participated in the important Council of Nicaea in 325 CE, where he initially supported but later expressed cautious reservations about the adopted creed. His extensive writings established the foundation for church history.

His most famous work, the Ecclesiastical History, chronicles the story of Christianity from its origins to his own time, creating a model for understanding history as the unfolding of divine purpose. He also wrote a universal timeline, the Chronicle, and a flattering biography of Emperor Constantine. Many of his other works were defenses of the Christian faith, such as Preparation for the Gospel and Demonstration of the Gospel, which quoted extensively from Greek philosophers and historians. These apologetic works were crucial for preserving fragments of many ancient texts that would otherwise be lost.

Eusebius is often called the "Father of Church History." His historical framework was adopted by later chroniclers, and his close association with Constantine provides a vital contemporary view of the Roman Empire's Christianization. His legacy is that of a foundational figure who shaped how the early church recorded and understood its own past and its relationship with classical culture and imperial power.
