Zosimus of Panopolis was a Greco-Egyptian alchemist who lived during the late third and early fourth centuries CE. He came from the city of Panopolis in Egypt, a region known for its craft traditions and pagan intellectual life during the early Christian era. His work marks a foundational moment in the history of alchemy, blending practical knowledge from Egyptian metallurgy and dyeing with philosophical ideas from Platonic, Stoic, and especially Gnostic and Hermetic thought. He is considered one of the earliest and most authoritative figures in the Greek alchemical tradition.

Zosimus viewed alchemy not merely as a technical craft but as a sacred art for the purification of the soul, mirroring the transformation of base metals into noble ones. He often wrote within a framework of spiritual revelation, addressing works to his sister Theosebeia and citing earlier, legendary authorities. His writings were extensive, though many survive only as fragments or in later Byzantine, Syriac, and Arabic compilations. Key surviving texts include collections like the Authentic Memoirs, visionary works such as The Final Quittance, and technical treatises on alchemical equipment and processes. These texts provide valuable insight into late antique laboratory practices and spiritual speculation.

According to modern scholars, Zosimus's historical importance is pivotal. He systematized the fusion of craft techniques with mystical theology, effectively creating the discipline of alchemy as it would be known for centuries. His ideas established core paradigms that influenced all subsequent Byzantine and Islamic alchemical traditions, and through them, the later esoteric and proto-scientific thought of medieval Europe.
