Life The designation Agnostos ("unknown") is a conventional term for works of uncertain authorship. No biographical information exists for this anonymous figure. The assigned dating of the 1st to 6th centuries CE places the work within the Late Antique and early Byzantine periods, a time of prolific Greek literary production that included both classical and Christian poetry. The use of the Koine dialect indicates composition in the common Greek of the Roman and early Byzantine empires.

Works A single, unspecified poetic work is attributed to this anonymous designation. Anonymous compositions from this broad era are numerous and can include secular epigrams, Christian hymns, and occasional verse, often preserved without attribution in later anthologies.

Significance Anonymous works constitute a major part of the literary corpus from antiquity. Their study focuses on content, genre, and historical context to situate them within a literary tradition. Such poetry offers valuable insights into popular themes, metrical practices, and cultural values, often preserved in collections like the Greek Anthology or liturgical texts due to their perceived enduring value.
